

Teen Driving: A Road Map

McKenzie Pediatrics 2009

Almost nothing scares parents of teens more than the idea of their son or daughter soon driving. And rightly so: teen drivers have the highest rates of injury and death among all age groups. Car crashes are the #1 cause of death among 15- to 20-year-olds in this country. More than 5500 young people die every year in car crashes, and thousands more are injured. There's no glossing over these facts.

However, safety is found in knowledge and involvement; studies have confirmed that the more parents know about teen driving, and the more they are involved in monitoring teens' driving behaviors, the lower the risks. Parents can play an important role in keeping their teens alive and safe.

The following are ways you can help keep teens safe on the road:

- Be a role model: If you expect your teen to drive safely, you need to drive safely, too. Always wear your seat belt. Don't drink and drive. Never allow any alcohol or illegal drugs in the car. Don't eat, drink, or talk on your cell phone, or do anything else that could distract you from your driving. Stay within the speed limit and obey all traffic signals.
- Know the laws: It is important that you know and understand the driver licensing laws, specifically, the restrictions and limitations on teen drivers who have permits and provisional licenses. You must also learn about your own legal responsibilities for providing a good supervised driving experience for your teen. For Oregon's laws, please see the resource link section at the end of this flyer.
- Set specific rules: Before you let your teen drive, set specific rules that must be followed. At first, the restrictions should be strict. You can gradually relax the rules after your teen has demonstrated safe driving. And the rules you set should depend on the maturity level of your teen. We strongly consider that you and your teen sign the Parent-Teen Driving Contract (see the resource links below) and that you join the "I Promise" program (see also the resource links).
- Driving is a privilege, not a right: Many teens see driving as an inalienable right, guaranteed in their imagined teen constitution. Parents are advised to remind their teens regularly that driving is instead a privilege, one that can be taken away as a consequence for actions that are reckless, or cause loss of trust.
- Enforce strict penalties: Generally, penalties for breaking the contract should match the seriousness of the rule broken. Punishments for reckless driving, such as speeding or drunk driving, should involve loss of driving privileges for an extended period, whereas punishments for driving teen passengers during the restricted period of the first six months might involve loss of driving privileges for one week.
- Take your teen on the road: The hours of driving practice in many driver education programs is not enough. Your teen needs a lot more supervised driving practice, and some nighttime driving is important, too. There are books, videos, and classes for parents on how to teach teen drivers. Remember that the first thing you'll need is a lot of patience.
- Check out the car: Make sure the car your teen is driving is safe and in good condition. Teens, especially, will be ill-equipped to troubleshoot any problems that arise while driving, or recognize them, for that matter. If your teen is buying a car, help your teen research safety ratings and find a mechanic to inspect the car. Air bags and lap-shoulder belts in the rear seat are important safety features.

- Make a tough decision: If you're concerned that your teen may not be ready to drive, you can prevent your teen from getting a license. All states allow parents to block their teen from getting a license if the teen is thought to be immature or reckless.

Once your teen has his or her license, your job has not ended. Parental monitoring has a significant influence not only over adolescent substance abuse, sexual initiation, delinquency, and aggression, but also over driving safety. In particular, signing and periodically revisiting a formal, written, driving-related parent-teen agreement with clear parent expectations reduces risky driving among teens, likely by reducing discordance between parent and teen interpretations of expectations and limits.

To protect teens from crashes, parents should set rules and effectively monitor driving behaviors. Engaged parents who are authoritative while supportive, and who ask repeated questions and provide frequent reminders of expectations, have the safest teen drivers.

Remember also that Oregon law prohibits drivers less than 18 years of age from using mobile communication devices, like cell phones, while driving. Similar prohibited items include two-way, wireless and texting devices (both hand-held, and hands-free). The only exceptions are if the driver is summoning emergency assistance or engaged in farming activities. If a teen is operating a motor vehicle while using a mobile communication device, it is a Class D traffic violation with a $97 fine. A conviction is also placed on the driver's record.
